1 A spiritual superintendent or overseer in the Christian Church

a Used in the New Testament versions to render the Gr word ἐπίσκοπος, applied to certain officers in early Christian churches, either as a descriptive term, or as their actual title In Wyclif, the Rhemish, and Revised Versions, the Gr word is so rendered in every instance, but in the other versions from Tindale to 1611, it is in Acts xx 28 (where applied to the πρεσβύτεροι or 'elders' of Ephesus) rendered 'overseers' Also applied to Christ, as descriptive of his office (Sometimes applied by those who do not recognize the episcopal order, to their pastor or chief elder, but only as a descriptive term, or as identifying his office with that of the New Testament 'bishop')

b spec In the Eastern, Western, Anglican, and other churches of episcopal order A clergyman consecrated for the spiritual government and direction of a 'diocese,' ranking beneath an archbishop (where these exist) and above the priests or presbyters, and deacons (This is the sense in which the word passed with Christianity into all the Teutonic langs, and thus the earliest sense in English)

Bishop in partibus infidelium in R C Ch, one dignified with the title of a bishopric, whose district or diocese is in the possession of infidels or heretics, originally applied to those expelled from the Holy Land by the Saracens.

Ble, obs f Blee sb, var Blee, Obs, colour, etc

-ble, a Of ble –L blem, nom bilis, suffix forming verbal adjs, with the sense 'given to tending to, like to, fit to able to', as in sit-bilis like, fit to stand' After consonant stems, -ibili-, as vend-ibili-, vinc-ibili-, after stems ending in a, e, i o, u, abili-, -ibili-, -obili ubili as honor-abili-, dele-bili, sepeli-bili, no-bili, volu-bili Some of these L words lived on into OFr, e g noble, amable, flebile, meubli- later, these became models for the extensive adoption of others from the Latin of literature Many of both sorts were from 12th to 15th c adopted in Eng from Fr, and here served as models for the direct adoption or formation of others from Latin a process which has gone on to the present day By far the most numerous of the ble words are those in able In L, abili- adjs arose only from verbs in are, but, in Fr, all pres pples in ant may give rise to an adj in -able, and as ant is now the universal form of pres pple, -able is the universal form of the adj suffix as a living element, -ible being only a fossil survival in words from L like horrible, possible, visible, not directly attached to a living Fr verb When the verb lives in Fr a modern adj in able has always taken the place of the earlier -ible form, as in vendable, croyable, préférable for L *vendibilis credibilis, profes-ibilis But in Eng there is a prevalent feeling for retaining -ible wherever there was or might be a L -ibilis, while -able is used for words of distinctly Fr or Eng origin, as conceivable, movable, speakable. Hence, where there is a verb in French and English as well as in Latin, English usage is distracted by conflicting and irreconcileable analogies Thus in the compounds of fer, L fero, Latin analogy requires preferible, referible (Walker, Rhym Dict), sufferible, French example gives preferable, referable, Fr and Eng analogy sufferable (cf suffering), Eng analogy (cf referring) gives referrable (Bailey), conferrable deferrable, there is also a mongrel spelling referrible, sanctioned by Dr Johnson but defensible on no analogy So with the variant spellings admittable, title, tractable, contractible, partable, -ible These discrepancies no mere etymological grounds can settle, though their number might be lessened by following French precedent, and extending -able to all words having a verb (with the same accent) in Eng, thus admittable, contractable, corruptable, exhaustable, vendable, etc, leaving -ible in credible, intelligible, legible, possible, etc See -ABLE, -IBLE The omission or retention of a final e mute before -able is also to a certain extent optional In words directly from L it is etymologically absent, as in excusable, declinable, in words from Eng (beside cases where it must be orthographically retained after c, g, as peaceable, changeable, chargeable, the latter also in Fr), there is a prevalent feeling for retaining the e in monosyllables, as tameable, nameable, saleable, which otherwise would have their meaning obscured (e g tamable, namable, salable) This produces ambiguity of form in such words as blamable (F blâmable), blameable, movable, moveable, lovable, loveable, sizable, sizeable, etc As much reason can be given and as much authority cited for one spelling as for the other, and until a reform of Eng spelling is made, the double form of these words must continue In words of English formation, a final consonant is usually doubled before -able when doubled in the pres pple, as clubbable, bidable, deferrable As to the meaning, Palsgrave (1530) says (p 302)

Of every adjective partycyple in ant may be formed an adjective by chaungynge of ant into able as of muant muable honorant honorable whose signifycacion may serve bothe actyvely and passively, as muable, apte or mete or able to chaunge or to be chaunged, honorable apte or mete or able to honour or to be honoured In this thyng the french tonge is muche more parfyte than our tonge is for where as they may forme of every partycyple in their tonge an adjective endyng in ble, in our tonge we have none suche but must nedes use circumlocution by apte mete or able, and our infinityve mode, save that we have a limitted as well adjectyves of the frenche tonge endyng in able and ible as commendable, visible etc

As here stated adjs in bili-, ble were originally active (and neuter) as well as passive Many of the former exist in Eng, e g capable, comfortable, suitable, agreeable, conformable, companionable turable equable, but the majority have become obsolete or remain only with a passive force as in reddible audible, flexible, which is also the only use of -able as a living formative, e g bearable, eatable, likeable, preferable, insufferable, saleable (I or exhaustive treatment of these words see F Hall Eng Adjectives in -able, London 1877)

BLISS 'benignity, blitheness, joy, happiness,' which affected the use of both words (see esp. senses 7 8) and led to occasional ME. spelling of the vb with i, y

The pa. t. and pple. are now generally spelt blessed, though always pronounced blest in modern prose, the pple. may be pronounced (ble sed) in verse, or liturgical reading As an adj. blessed (ble sed) is now the regular prose form, but the archaic blest is frequent in verse and traditional phrases as e. g. the Isles of the Blest]

Orig. meaning (prob.), To make 'sacred' or 'holy' with blood, to consecrate by some sacrificial rite which was held to render a thing inviolable from profane use of men and evil influence of men or demons (The streaking of the lintel and door posts with blood, Exod. XII. 23, to mark them as holy to the Lord and inviolable by the destroying angel, was apparently the kind of idea expressed by blôedsian in pre-christian times Cf. also the history of the Latin words consecrare and sacrificium) Hence, in historical use

I To make sacred, consecrate, hallow

1 trans To consecrate (a thing) by a religious rite, the utterance of a formula or charm, in later times by a prayer committing it to God for his patronage, defence, and prospering care, as in to bless food, to ask God's blessing on it (cf. 5)

As applied to a 'snow squall,' the word became general in the American newspapers during the severe winter of 1880–81 but according to the Milwaukee Republican 4 Mar 1881, it had been so applied in the Northern Vindicator (Esherville, Ill.) between 1860 and 1870. It was apparently in colloquial use in the West much earlier, but whether Col Crockett's use of it in 1834 (sense 1) was fig, taken from the stifling blast, or was the earliest sense, and subseq transferred to the blast is not determined.]

Though evidence of actual connexion is wanting, it is conjectured that the Eng 'bloat herring' is, in some way, identical with these, and means, etymologically, either 'soft (moist) herring', in opposition to 'dried', or else 'soaked, steeped herring', in reference to part of the process of curing the herrings so termed In Act 18 Chas II in 'bloated' is opposed to 'dried', and it is explained by Blount as 'half dried', but most of the quotations give it as meaning (in actual use 'smoked', (smoking being an important part of the process One at least (1613 below) appears to identify it with 'puffed up', and thus with sense 2 of the next word, whereas Sylvester, in 1616, says 'Herrings shrink in bloating, but moist herrings are naturally plumper than those more thoroughly dried See also next word, and Bloat *v*²]

trans To cure (herrings) by a process which leaves them soft and only half dried This is now done by leaving them in dry salt on a floor for 24 hours, washing in fresh water spitting and smoking them over an oak fire for a period varying from 24 hours to 3 or 4 days, according to the time they are to be kept before being eaten (Earlier authorities speak of their being steeped for a time in brine before smoking, which has to be remembered in discussing the original meaning of bloat)

Bloated herrings are opposed to dried or red herrings which are left in dry salt for 10 days, and smoked for 14 days, whence their deep colour and shrivelled dryness.

[The origin is not quite certain, but there is good reason to think that it was at first a reference to the habits of the 'bloods' or aristocratic rowdies of the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th c The phrase 'bloody drunk' was apparently = 'as drunk as a blood' (cf 'as drunk as a lord'), thence it was extended to kindred expressions, and at length to others, probably, in later times, its associations with bloodshed and murder (cf a bloody battle, a bloody butcher) have recommended it to the rough classes as a word that appeals to their imagination We may compare the prevalent craving for impressive or graphic intensives, seen in the use of jolly, awfully, terribly, devilish, damned, damnedest, ripping, rattling, thumping, stunning, thundering, etc There is no ground for the notion that 'bloody', offensive as from associations it now is to ears polite, contains any profane allusion or has connexion with the oath 'sblood'!]

Blow (blōu), sb 1 Forms 5 Sc. and north. blaw, 6 bloe, 6–7 blowe, 6– blow [First found in 15th c , the earliest instances being Sc and north Eng with form blaw Origin doubtful
(The etymology of blow has naturally sought in the stem of the OTeut vb. blewwan* Goth bliggwan to beat (which is not related to L flagĕre), in OHG bluwwan, MHG bliuwen, mod G bläuen 'to beetle, batter, beat, drub' (whence bläuel a beetle), MDu and mod.Du blou

wen 'to beat, thrash, drub', now esp. 'to brake or swingle flax or hemp' (whence blowsel a brake for flax). The OE. cognate would have been blówsan*, but of this no trace is found, and it is not easy on any theory to understand its giving rise to a substantive in the 13th c. without ever appearing itself. It is still less likely that an English substantive could be formed from the Du blouwen or its Ger equivalent, when there is no such substantive in these langs. ('Du. blouw' in] is a figment.)

Another suggestion which suits the form and accounts also for the early Sc and north English variant bleuw, is that this is the same word as Blow sb [4], or at least, like it, derived from Blow v [1]. The difficulty is, that, as to the sense, early uses of the word do not indicate any such origin, while historically, Blow sb [4] (in its own undoubted senses) is of later appearance. The analogy of Fr. souffler, also, in which a word for 'a blow with the flat of the hand' arises out of the vb souffler 'to blow wind', though striking at first sight, proves on examination of the history of souffler to be merely superficial.)

Blue-stocking (blūˑ stɒ kiŋ), sb [As an attributive phrase, with the sense of 'wearing blue stockings', this is found as early as the 17th c (see 1 a), in its transferred sense it originated in connexion with re-unions held in London about 1750, at the houses of Mrs Montague, Mrs Vesey, and Mrs Ord, who exerted themselves to substitute for the card playing, which then formed the chief recreation at evening parties, more intellectual modes of spending the time, including conversation on literary subjects, in which eminent men of letters often took part Many of those who attended eschewed 'full dress', one of these was Mr Benjamin Stillingfleet, who habitually wore grey or 'blue worsted, instead of black silk stockings In reference to this, Admiral Boscawen is said (Sir W Forbes Life of Beattie (1806) I 210 note) to have derisively dubbed the coterie 'the Blue Stocking Society' (as not constituting a dressed assembly) The ladies who supported the reform were at first called Blue Stockingers, Blue Stocking Ladies, and at length, about 1790, when the actual origin of the term was remembered by few, Blue Stockings, in later slang abbreviated to Blues]

Bluff, v 1 [Immediately related to Bluff sb 2 'a blinker for a horse', which, as it appears later than the verb, was presumably named from it, though the reverse is also possible The etymology is quite unknown the meaning 'blind fold, hoodwink' does not appear to have any possible connexion with Bluff a or sb 1, the word is probably one of the numerous cant terms (see Bam, Bamboozle) which arose between the Restoration and the reign of Queen Anne Sense 2 had certainly originally the same meaning, but it looks as if recent users imagined a connexion with Bluff a or sb 1, and made it mean 'to blindfold or hoodwink by assuming a fictitious bold front]

14. On board (beside the technical sense in 12 c) has now, in common use, the meaning: On or in a ship, boat, etc.; into or on to a ship. That this expression is elliptical, is witnessed by the fuller form on ship-board (cf. ME. 'within schippe burdez' in 12), and the construction 'on board of the ship', or 'on board the ship' (where it is perhaps often supposed that 'board' means the deck).

On board appears to be a later expansion (cf. afoot, on foot) of Aboard, a-bord, and this to have been taken directly from Fr. à bord, as in aller ou monter à bord, être à bord, short for an bord du vaisseau, in which bord 'ship's side' comes contextually to be equal to 'ship' itself. Similar phrases are used in other modern Teut. langs., as Du. aan boord, Ger. an Bord, Sw. Dan. ombord. Although en borde occurs poetically in OE., and upon borde in ME., in sense of 'in, upon ship', these appear to have no historical connexion with the later a-board, which begins about 1500, and on board, which appears late in the 17th c.

Boat (bōut) Forms 1–3 bát, 4 bot, 4–5 boot, (4 6 boote), 4 7 bote, 6 7 boate, (6 botte, boitt, 7 Sc pl bottes), 6– boat, north 4 6 bate, 5–6 bait, bayt, (5 pl bat(t)is) [OF bát the subsequent phonetic history in Eng is perfectly normal, but the origin of the Ob word, and its relation to forms in other languages presents difficulties

OE bát (unless onomatopœic) must have been either the regular representative of an Aryan bhādo-*, (w), or an adoption of a word bát from some other language (1) The chief relevant fact in Teutonic is that ON had also bátr in the sense 'small boat', whence regularly Sw båt, Da. baad' boat But the OE and ON words were not cog nate, since the ON form corresponding to OE bát would have been beit r*, while the OE form corresp to ON bátr (=OTeut bâto*) would have been bæt*, bêt*, giving mod Eng beet* In one of the two langs., therefore bát must have been adopted from the other the accessible evidence is on the whole in favour of its priority in OF This is further favoured by the actual occurrence in ON of a neuter sb best 'boat' (Hávamál st 90, etc.), which, exc in gender, is the required form corresponding to OE bát, from OTeut basto-* It is therefore highly probable that the OE bát is original and bátr an ON adoption of it (2) In any case the absence of the word from continental West Germanic is remarkable there an OTeut bâto-* would have given OS bêt, Du beet, OHG bei, Ger beiss, an OTeut. bâto-* would have given OS bát, Du. baat, OHG bâz mod.G baas No such forms exist on the contrary mod Du, I G and mod G have actually boot of these the Ger word is a recent adoption from LG or Du boot found in early MDu c 1250, the d of which can be accounted for only by its adoption from early ME, or from Scand., at a date when the d of these langs had already become (ð). (3) A stem bât or batt must have had an early diffusion in Romanic. cf F bateau, Ob batel, Pr batelh Cat batell, Sp batel It batello (Florio), now battello, diminutives from a primitive bâto, batto* the latter actually used in L. in sense of 'small sea vessel', OF bat 'small boat found in 12th c, med L had also *bâtus batt*us the former app. only in English documents the latter (as well as batellus) continental But no etymology of these is found in Romanic, on the contrary Diez can only refer them back to OE bát, this is extremely improbable, and the difficulties are only a little lessened by substituting ON bátr as the presumed source. Moreover this derivation requires bâtus* as the original type, while the form really indicated by OF, med.L., and It is batt*us Unless the latter could be a neben form of bâtus (cf It tutto, beside L tôtus, Sp todo etc.), it could hardly have any etymological connexion with English Norse bát A Celtic source has been frequently attributed to both the OE and Romanic words, but Celtic scholars now know that the cited OWelsh bat, Welsh bad, is merely an adoption of the OE word (4) Franck points out that, in MDu, boot fem. meant 'cask', as in mod Du. mead-boat = 'cask, barrel, tub, prob identical with F botte, Pr and Sp. bota, It botte, med Lat bota butta, Burn, and suggests that this may bear at least upon the Du and LG boot it is true that words of general sense like 'vessel', vaisseau, and specific words like 'tub', have been applied to ships and boats, but besides that no vestige of any such sense as 'cask, tub, etc. appears either in ON or OE bát, these last could in no way be connected in form with bota, botta, or butta. (5) The conclusions at present tenable are, therefore, that apparently there was an OTeut. bôto-*, preserved only in ON bátr and OE. bát, that the latter was also adopted in ON as bát r, and that either from Eng or Norse the word was adopted in Low Ger and Dutch as bêt, boot But that the Romanic batto, bâto, and its family, arose out of the English Norse word is very doubtful.]

Pl. books; in 1 bōcu, bōc. [A com. Teut. word, differing however in gender and other points in the various langs. With OE. bōc monosyllabic fem. (pl. bēc) cf. These forms indicate an OTeut. bōk-s* str. fem., the plural of which was in OHG. and elsewhere sometimes made neuter (after the analogy of neuter monosyllabic plurals), and this gender extended to the sing. The original meaning was evidently 'writing-tablet, leaf, or sheet'. cf. Venantius Fortunatus Carm. vii. 18, 19 'barbara fraxineis pingatur runa tabellis', also OS. thia bōk the writing-tablet, 'pugillaris' Luke i. 63 (in Heliand 232, 235), OE. bōc charter: in pl. tablets, written sheets, hence 'book,' a sense subseq.

Generally thought to be etymologically connected with the name of the beech-tree, OE. bóc, béce, ON. bók — (see BEECH), the suggestion being that inscriptions were first made on beechen tablets, or cut in the bark of beech-trees; but there are great difficulties in reconciling the early forms of the two words, seeing that bôk-s 'writing-tablet' is the most primitive of all.]

3. gen. A written or printed treatise or series of treatises, occupying several sheets of paper or other substance fastened together so as to compose a material whole.

In this wide sense, referring to all ages and countries, a book comprehends a treatise written on any material (skin, parchment, papyrus, paper, cotton, silk, palm leaves, bark, tablets of wood, ivory, slate, metal, etc.), put together in any portable form, e. g. that of a long roll, or of separate leaves, hinged, strung, stitched, or pasted together.

a. spec (In reference to modern things.) Such a treatise occupying numerous sheets or leaves fastened together at one edge called the back, so as to be opened at any particular place, the whole being protected by binding or covers of some kind. But, since either the form of the book or its subject may be mainly or exclusively the object of attention, this passes on either side into

b. The material article so made up, without regard to the nature of its contents, even though its pages are occupied otherwise than with writing or printing, or are entirely blank (cf. 9): e.g. 'a handsome book', i e. a trophy of the binder's art, 'a tiny book,' one that may be put in the waistcoat pocket.

c. A literary composition such as would occupy one or more volumes, without regard to the material form or forms in which it actually exists, 'an intellectual composition, in prose or verse, at least of sufficient extent to make one volume' (Littré s.v. livre). In this sense Carlyle described himself as 'a writer of books'.

It is not now usual to call a (modern) literary composition in manuscript a 'book', unless we think of its printing as a thing to follow in due course. In sense b every volume is a 'book'; whilst in sense c one 'book' may occupy several volumes, and on the other hand one large volume may contain several 'books', i. e. literary works originally published as distinct books. No absolute definition of a 'book' in this sense can be given in general, a short literary composition (especially if ephemeral in character, and therefore also in form) receives some other name, as tract, pamphlet, sketch, essay, etc.

Boor (būə1) Forms (5 bouеer), 6–7 boore, bour, (7 bore, boar), 7–boor (9 bauer) [A word of involved history in and out of English, though the ultimate etymology is clear enough The 16th c bour, boore, may possibly have been native Eng, repr an earlier bûr*, short for OE gebûr 'dweller, husbandman, farmer, countryman' (Bosw), a deriv of bûr 'dwelling, house, cottage, Bower', f the verb root, bû to dwell cf the compound neighbour –ME neȝebur –OE nēah gebûr 'nigh-dweller', also modern East Anglian Bob 'neighbour' as a form of address But on the whole, in its literary use, the word is more likely to have been adopted from LG bûr, Du boer, see the quots under sense 2, and Boer These words are themselves etymological equivalents (or nearly so) of OE gebûr, the OHG form being gibûr, gibûro, MHG gebûr, gebûre, MLG gebûr, and bûr (occurring 1365), mod LG buur (made bauer in mod HG), MDu ghebure, ghebuer, and buer, also (late) geboer, which was not properly a Du form, but probably, according to Cosijn, adopted from Frisian, or, according to Franck, from the LG on the eastern frontier of the Netherlands This last is in mod Du boer The original sense of WGer gibûr, gibûro, was 'inmate of a bûr or Bower, fellow occupier of a dwelling, farm, or village, neighbour, mate' Partly from being preserved mainly in rural use, but largely from association with the vb bûan (MHG MDu bûwen, Ger bauen, Du bouwen) to inhabit, cultivate, till (of which, as we have seen, it was not a derivative, though a cognate word from same root bû-), its original connexion with bûr, Bower, was lost, and the sense more and more confined to that of 'peasant, rustic', and thence 'clown'

While mod Ger has merged the word in form with bauer agent noun from bauen to cultivate, to build, mod Du, on the contrary, makes a distinction in use between the native buur (MDu ghebure ghebuer) 'neighbour, and the adopted boer (MDu geboer) 'peasant, husbandman, farmer clown, knave at cards, and keeps both distinct from bouwer 'tiller, builder (though in MDu the latter was used in senses subsequently taken up by geboer, boer)]

Caxton has also buty (see 1491), and in 17th c we find an instance of bootyn for butin. but on the whole the contact of the two forms appears to be slight.
